With Healthcare Workers in South Africa (140 000), Kenya (49 000) and Nigeria (100 000), the following playbook will provide healthcare marketing professionals – from social media marketers to healthcare execs. – the insights and ideas needed to build advanced healthcare marketing strategies.

Kind Regards,

The opportunity is now.

Healthcare has and will remain of crucial importance to our global community, with people increasingly seeking health-related content from trusted experts in the industry. Now is the time for healthcare marketers to amplify their purpose and use their specialized understanding of healthcare to prioritize efforts that will meet the needs of the community.

The mission of LinkedIn is simple: connect the world's professionals to make them more productive. This is also the primary goal of the healthcare industry.

Our deep understanding of the healthcare space is backed by first-party data and tools that advance healthcare marketers' strategies and provide a trusted platform to engage relevant audiences in meaningful ways.

This playbook will provide healthcare marketing professionals — from social media marketers to healthcare executives — the insights and ideas needed to build advanced healthcare marketing strategies.

What you will find in the playbook:

1. An overview of the evolving healthcare marketing industry
2. The importance of trust in healthcare
3. How LinkedIn is essential to advancing healthcare marketing strategies

The evolving healthcare marketing industry.

Specificity is more important than ever before.

Healthcare marketers know the importance of defining and engaging not just target healthcare audiences, but also specific, focused areas of expertise within healthcare; from anesthesiologists to chiropractors and beyond, pinpointing a range of industry figures from key influencers to investors, reporters to PR managers, legislators to business leaders, and so on. It's important to not only target, but also define and engage.

You can foster deeper relationships by building well-defined audiences and creating specific, curated content.

Today, it's most likely you're being asked to do more with less, within parameters that sometimes shift by the hour. Efficiency, therefore, requires you to be more selective in order to be effective. Prioritizing a "quality over quantity" approach will ensure specific messaging meets specific audience needs.

Healthcare marketing audiences seek brands that offer more meaningful content and value opportunities for deeper levels of engagement.

Behavioral shifts among healthcare professionals has them seeking robust thought leadership content containing insights and new information. We've seen this reflected on LinkedIn, with 25-30% of content produced by individuals and brands now focused on knowledge sharing, editorial, and thought leadership.

The importance of trust in healthcare.

Trust and healthcare are deeply connected.

“ The trusted organization is the one that people turn to when they are in need. In healthcare, almost by definition, the customers are people who are in need. ”

— David A. Shore, PhD
founding director of the Trust Initiative at the Harvard School of Public Health

The recent Edelman Trust Barometer Special Report has revealed that trust in healthcare is at record-level highs, even within the last year.

Global trust in healthcare in 2020¹

There's a growing opportunity for healthcare brands to increase awareness and deepen their relationships with consumer and professional audiences by building trust.

Focusing on trust may benefit pharma and insurance in their marketing efforts.

While trust is gaining momentum across healthcare, trust in insurance and pharmaceutical sub-sectors has historically lagged. Recent increases in trust show that prioritizing innovation and executive voices as marketing strategies are an opportunity for these sub-sectors.

* 2020 update not available

2020 update:
Trust is gaining momentum in pharma

Trust in pharma increased 22% in the last year according to Edelman Healthcare Trust reports.

This represents a crucial inflection point for marketers as they adjust their corporate reputation strategy to sustain momentum.

Trust must be delivered with clarity and credibility.

According to Edelman's 2020 Trust Barometer and The Big Idea: The Trust Crisis from Harvard Business Review, there are two key components in building brand trust via competence and ethics, which raise the following questions:

Competence

1. Technically, can you deliver and innovate?
2. Socially, do you understand your business environment, and can you respond to change?

Ethics

- Is your company motivated to serve others' interests as well as its own?
- Does your company use fair means to achieve its goals?
- Does your company take responsibility for all its impact?

When it comes to defining your trust narrative, ethics drive deeper engagements over competence.

Ethical drivers are

3X

more important to company trust
than competence.

Less than 50% of consumers believe that businesses are doing well or very well at ensuring that the most in-demand products and services are available and easily accessible.

Executive voices are the epicenter of trust.

of healthcare sector employees trust their CEO when speaking about the pandemic.¹

believe their CEO is meeting the needs of the public during this time.¹

Get started with executive voices:

1. Involve existing, active voices in brand marketing messages.
2. Start conversations with internal experts.
3. Read Trust in a Time of Uncertainty for examples of how executives are using LinkedIn to amplify their voices.

Drive engagement with receptive audiences.

Now is the time for healthcare brands to build on existing trust, strengthen relationships with key audiences (e.g. providers, influencers, brokers, and consumers) through digital advertising to expand reach and achieve efficiencies.

Trust is fleeting, so engage with your target audiences in the right environment today.

Large trust increases are followed by large trust falls.

LinkedIn is essential to an advanced healthcare marketing strategy.

People need to feel like they are in a trusted environment when they engage, and LinkedIn is the most trusted platform.²

One of the challenges and opportunities of social media marketing is facilitating conversations between consumers and brands. Because members and brands consider LinkedIn to be a secure and trustworthy platform, a higher-quality dialogue is possible than what's often found on other platforms.

Consumers agree, and they continually rank LinkedIn as the #1 trusted social platform²

Whereas we can reach huge audiences on other platforms outside of LinkedIn, we don't reach a quality of a certain audience. And that's why we really believe that it's the most trusted platform out there.

Perceived brand safety

While other social media advertising partners have had brand perception challenges, LinkedIn is consistently rated the most brand-safe platform.³

LinkedIn members value their individual brand, allowing brands to reach relevant, high-quality audiences with confidence.

Being a platform that members use to showcase professional achievements sets LinkedIn apart. When careers are in the making and reputations are being forged, professional and personal information is updated regularly. These member updates help marketers better understand their audience and facilitate relevant conversations, enriching the healthcare industry and growing your brand within it.

Mindset matters

Healthcare professionals on LinkedIn are active knowledge seekers and leverage the platform for sharing and engaging with relevant content. They are also receptive to advertising on LinkedIn, putting them in the right mindset for brands providing useful information.

Their intent mindset may be why LinkedIn users are more receptive to healthcare content marketing.
